Labour law is widely considered to be in crisis by scholars of the field. This crisis has an obvious external dimension - labour law is attacked for impeding efficiency, flexibility, and development; vilified for reducing employment and for favouring precariousness; and contested because it appears to be too subtle and volatile for simple, catch-all solutions. Ultimately, Labour law is at fault for conflicts related to identity. Starting when courts censored birth control information as pornography and let men rape their wives, and continuing through the “sexual revolution” and into the present day (when rape, gay rights, sex trafficking, and sex on the internet are all linked in some way to the issue of sexual identity), Berkowitz shows the emptiness of sanctimonious condemnation, and argues that sexual questions be faceless legal battles. The law is made by people, after all, and nothing sparks intolerance – on the left and right –– more than sex. Ultimately, Berkowitz shows the emptiness of sanctimonious condemnation, and argues that sexual questions are too subtle and volatile for simple, catch-all solutions.

He delves into the impact of diverse and complex events that have shaped the city’s history and present-day development.

These photo galleries, illustration layouts, and maps offer a comprehensive and insightful look into the factors that have shaped the city’s development and present-day conditions, offering a fresh perspective on how political and economic forces interact to influence the city’s current state and future potential.
